

Prompt B

My experiences in life include living in countries other than the United States. I was interested in learning about other cultures and languages. In addition, when my family returned to this country we lived in a small town close to Washington D.C. where I learned about the Federal Gov't. and during the Civil Rights Era.

From these as well as what I learned in school I think that learning on a social and cultural level is equally important as what we might only learn during our formal education, that is also important. In school we learn about the world, academic disciplines, how to communicate and how to make a living.

Learning is a process. I sometimes think that we are leaving our students behind with so much emphasis on digital technology. The young learner needs to acquire the ability to learn, new understandings, knowledge, behaviors, and skills. They need to develop values and beneficial preferences.

At the elementary level learning includes simple instruction. Too often the student is left without explanation of meaning. Yes it's important to acknowledge and encourage diversity and culture. But also they will need those skills that today we want to think technology is going to handle for us.
